Increased beta-1 adrenergic receptors in a nerve-injured model of chemoresistance. At 72 hours following periventricular nerve injury, the majority of neurons in the hypothalamic and preoptic areas of the forebrain (areas involved with the control of sex hormones, water, and food) expressed high levels of resistance to induction of cytochrome P450 2B1 by delta 9-tetrahydrocannabinol (THC). Some of the mechanisms responsible for this resistance include fewer cannabinoid receptor sites on the membrane of these cells (Slater, T., and Jones, T. C., Nature, 325:112-114, 1987), and a postreceptor mechanism (Traiman, R. A., and Chaloupka, J. F., Endocrinology, 128:1321-1329, 1991). In the present study, we used ligand binding studies of beta-1 and beta-2 adrenergic receptors to examine changes in the beta-1 receptors induced by periventricular nerve injury. Results show that ligand binding was significantly increased in forebrain hypothalamus, preoptic area, and cortex of rats with periventricular nerve injury compared to control sham-operated rats. These data suggest that an increase in beta-1 adrenergic receptor number in these areas may contribute to the THC resistance seen in these areas. In addition, the nucleus accumbens exhibited an increase in beta-1 receptor binding in animals with periventricular nerve injury compared to sham-operated rats. In contrast to the areas of the brain involved with the control of sex hormones, food, and water, no change in beta-1 receptor binding was seen in the hippocampus following periventricular nerve injury. These data suggest that beta-1 adrenergic receptors may play a role in the increased resistance to THC induction in the hypothalamus and preoptic areas.

Q: PHP boolean switch statement. How does it work?

switch ($row->available) { case $true:
    $availability = $availability? $row->price :
