A: Due to its containerization infrastructure, you are paying for a Mcnay-bay server which (being a server) is likely to be associated with a single IP address rather than one per user, etc. Someone actually did a study and has been posting on this question about the breakdown of various costs that go into a web hosting subscription. If you don't know what it costs you, don't make a big mistake. When you choose to do it this way and do your math, you have to decide how important your image quality is to you. If you are willing to sacrifice some quality to be able to push more images into a couple months of storage on a few servers, you might be able to get a contract with a host that does allow you to use their service. Note however that they might have other limitations that might not be suitable for your project, like a tradeoff between the quality of the service and how many requests they can handle with their server. If you want to do a higher quality job, you are going to have to decide what you are willing to pay and what quality means to you and then run a lot of tests to see what works best for you. If you are willing to spend a lot on your service you could also consider going the self-hosted route, which allows you to pick your service provider by paying them directly rather than using a third-party provider. For example, imgur charges a lot of money and they give you the images in the highest quality you can make from them. If you have some sort of a limited budget and you know you are going to have to compromise on quality when you convert, that might be a good alternative to the self-hosted route. Of course, once you run out of money you will have to stop, but you also know that going self-hosted is pretty cheap to do when you buy a domain name. Depending on the type of conversion you are doing, you might be able to use one of the many tutorials online to do your conversion from the built-in tools in photoshop or illustrator.
