Construct your own universe of Science Fiction

A great deal of the challenge in STC will be choosing your own outcome. You may find yourself being chased by a monster in the darkness, and forced to make a hard decision as to what weapon to use to take it out. You may find yourself rescued by one of your "friends", a space-alien or another human being who may have their own agendas. Collect new bodies and dead bodies STC offers hundreds of ways to progress, and there's no right or wrong way to play. The first time you play STC, you may not know where to even start. There are a lot of different features to learn, and many options to consider. The choice is all yours, so pick and choose what you want. Be the scientist you've always wanted to be, and don't be afraid to make a mistake. The unsettling art style of the game is both a bold and beautiful choice. In combination with a character like Edwin the game feels like a real meeting of the minds between a brilliant new artist and a brilliant new scientist. Your brain, your rules, and the greatest adventure ever made. You are trapped in a mystical place, caught in a constant nightmare. As you explore your surroundings you'll uncover a number of gadgets, weapons and other items. Each piece of equipment or item has its own characteristics and abilities, but will it be enough to help you escape? In the past there have been many games where you have been given a set of rules or set of equations to solve, and in doing so you earn yourself a point, a score, or some other tally. In 'STC: Silent Tower Challenge', we are asking you to think for yourself. As you progress through the game, you may uncover the basis for the puzzles that you are presented with

What's new in Puzzle Art: Rodents:

By Mike Pittawkins "What's up?" "I don't know." "What?" "I don't know." Well, the large green dinosaur says he is about to take the plunge into this great unknown at a time in history when the great explorers of the animal world are just now beaming back home with their first exploratory successful story of discovery. The moment he's ready, the whistling great horned owl looks straight into camera lens stating, "Hi, it's me, Fin the Penguin." Why is Fin here in the parks, he wonders? "The stories all sound good, maybe I'll just stay in the big city." This is the tale of how this great recreating I-80 just north of the Oklahoma border learns his life is affected greatly by being needed and finding some unexpected fame for his services. Less than a minute ago, the zoo staff had been in the park gathering up the last of the young white leopard pups and preparing to load them into the back of the zoo's jimmy rover. All attention was suddenly diverted from the workers preparing to load the pups into the back of the zoo's jimmy rover when a monitor was activated near the various zoo natural history exhibits showing a young adult pug sitting in a cage labeled "gorilla". Pregnant female gorillas move around their homes in a chained fashion, though never walking in a straight line, as they attempt to find a mate. Usually these females can be found walking about holding two or three trees in their hands or dragging them behind them when they move about. They are most active during the daylight hours of the day and are often quite vocal. The female was crossing the back yard heading towards the drainage ditch lined with clay and weeds when a male gorilla could be seen pacing back and forth watching her with intense interest. A beeper sound was heard coming from the gorilla's cage as his, "Daddy" (father) saw the female as if being called to meet. The male climbed out of his cage, stretched and yawned and then returned to his pacing that seemed never ending. Now what?! This was not your average rose-tinted zoo setting. This was fine residential area south of the Oklahoma City zoo. Traffic in front of these exhibit areas could be heard over the insistent beep called out by the female gorilla. Traffic lights were already at green with coming cars
