i think ima has done three important things for management accounting: (1) it has enabled us to begin to think of accounting as a management discipline. prior to ima, accounting was largely a financial-reporting function. to report financials, we needed to know the financial statements of the entity, which is not the same as what is needed to manage the entity. (2) it has enabled us to begin to think of accounting as a management discipline. (3) it has enabled us to begin to think of accounting as a management discipline. as the scope of the field expanded, a need for a separate association grew. in 1959, the accounting profession established the institute of management accountants. it has since evolved into a large, diverse, and rapidly changing organization, and the ima foundation continues to play a major role in promoting management accounting. it is, in fact, the largest academic organization of its kind, with nearly 4,000 members and more than 100 affiliates. during the 1960s, interest in management accounting grew as companies sought to understand what they were doing and how they could do it better, and management accounting was adopted by fortune 500 companies as a way to improve their performance. during the 1970s, management accounting evolved to address the need to improve the efficiency of business operations. and since the 1990s, it has expanded into even more areas. the passage of the sarbanes-oxley act in 2002 put management accounting on the map, and its emergence as a key element of corporate governance has positioned it for even greater growth in the years ahead. the ima foundation now sponsors hundreds of events each year and is a significant force in shaping management accounting education and professional development.
