This constant checking and scanning of the map by the aimbot can be done while driving or walking or any other activity that does not demand your full attention to another subject, making the aimbot compatible with a wider spectrum of users, without their being skilled with the mouse or joystick. The aimbot might lose targets after a long time, and it might even start moving out of the field of view and firing randomly, but it is possible to prevent the aimbot from losing targets and protecting your tank from the aimbot (which does not have aim or control point of view), after all, you are using the aimbot for two purposes: farming and dominating your opponents, so you will want to protect your own self and your tank from the aimbot. A VANGA aimbot has a minimum of 400,000 lines of code and, apart from this, the system remembers every move it made and stores all of its previous positions so that it can move to any of these positions on any level in seconds. The aimbot then waits for the targets to reappear on the screen and shoots them when they have shown up and takes another move to position itself and aim at a new target. By moving every second, it makes sure that there is no need for any game script to detect the aimbot. As the game developers and manufacturers have often made their games bot-resistant, VANGA aimbot would help you in any game that has bot resistance.
